CB&I Team:

I'd like to share with you several important steps we plan to take to ensure that we are ready to operate as one company when the transaction closes, which we anticipate will occur in the coming months.

These steps will help us build a common culture, position ourselves for long-term growth and allow us to be more competitive in a dynamic industry. I'm proud to tell you that our new organization is beginning to take shape, and today I'd like to explain what it will look like and who will be leading it.

Building a strong and engaged leadership

In my previous communication, I reinforced the fundamentals of our business and emphasized that I want to make sure this is a great place to work a company that is proud of its legacy, customer-centric model and focus on safety. To make this a reality, we need a strong, engaged leadership team that is collaborative, open and interested in hearing your ideas.

I am pleased to announce that the senior leadership of the new company will be a combination of executives from both organizations, along with two new hires, who will bring fresh perspectives and ideas to the table. It will be structured as follows:

I spent several days offsite with this team last week at dedicated workshops as we worked together to build the new company. I was impressed by the level of trust, the quality of their ideas, the high enthusiasm for what we are creating and their passion for our industry. Together, we worked to build an extended leadership team with top talent from both companies. There will be more announcements about this in the coming weeks.

An integrated global structure

We are building for the future of the energy industry. Our new company will utilize the best ideas, practices and processes from both organizations to deliver certainty and increased value to our customers around the world. We will leverage best-in-class operational excellence, strong cost management and disciplined project execution to become a true industry leader. This requires consistent, reliable and coordinated execution.

Starting on the first day of our new company, we will be organized by four areas – Americas, Europe/Africa/Russia, Middle East and Asia Pacific. We need to have an executive presence in each of the geographic areas where we do business. It is not enough to know our customers, we need to be present to understand the cultures they operate in and the pressures they face – competitive, strategic and political. Each area leader will be responsible for overseeing customer satisfaction, project delivery and profitability in their area. They will be supported by our centralized project delivery functions – including project management, engineering, supply chain, marine, fabrication, construction and QHSES – which will allocate the necessary resources for each project and customer.

The only exception to this model is CB&I's technology business. It is a tier-one organization and will continue to operate as a distinct licensing, engineering and after-market services business.

The area, product and delivery teams will be supported by centralized functions including corporate strategy, global sales, finance, human resources, legal and communications. This will enable us to become a leaner, more consistent supporter of our projects and customers.

Our global commercial and sales teams – including those from Technology – will also be integrated to maximize our ability to extend, grow and leverage our existing customer relationships around the world. This includes our bidding functions, which will be centralized to improve allocation of resources, consistency of approach and limit exposure to loss-making projects.

Let me reiterate that today's announcement is about creating a new kind of company. Working together in a new vertically-integrated structure, we will be well positioned to maximize our cost-efficient delivery model and our proven ability to control risk in bidding. We will partner with our customers to provide integrated, end-to-end solutions from the wellhead to the storage tank that deliver the quality, efficiency and dependability needed to keep their businesses growing. And, we will also build a strong internal culture that will distinguish us in our industry and set us up for success with our customers and with each other.

I know that many of you will have questions about these changes. You'll hear more details from me, and from the rest of our leadership team, in the coming weeks. The integration planning process is going well and we still expect to close the transaction in Q2.

I look forward to your partnership along this journey. We have exciting days ahead.

David
