On June 29, 2008 InBev S.A. released the following advertisement:

What would not change at Anheuser-Busch. 33 A brewery's heritage, tradition, and connection to its local community are as important as the beer it makes. That's why Anheuser-Busch and St. Louis mean so much to one another. At InBev, we are a combination of local brewers and their famous beers from around the world like Stella Artois, Beck's and Labatt. So we not only share Anheuser-Busch's passion for brewing the best, but also understand what makes beer truly great: time-honored institutions and traditions, and deep roots in the community that go back generations. That's why we'll never change what matters most. The great heritage of Anheuser-Busch and its flagship brand, Budweiser.® The company's U.S. headquarters in St. Louis. The U.S. breweries, which will all remain open. Grant's Farm. The Clydesdales. And the longstanding tradition of social responsibility and giving back to the communities where Anheuser-Busch operates, especially in St. Louis. As part of a stronger global company, we believe Anheuser-Busch can grow to become even greater. By bringing the great taste of Anheuser-Busch brands to beer drinkers around the world, in all the places InBev does business today. Just as InBev and Anheuser-Busch have done together in Canada for almost 30 years, where we've grown Budweiser in to the #1 selling beer and Bud Light® in to the fastest growing beer brand. Creating new jobs and opportunities that help economies grow. A change in ownership doesn't mean a change in what matters. Bud will always be Bud. And Anheuser-Busch and its bestselling beers will always be here. In St. Louis, across the U.S., and soon, available to millions of new consumers around the world, just waiting to enjoy their distinctly American taste.
